Cranial morphology and postcranial ontogeny in the long-necked rat (Georychus capensis) and a comparative study. A new species of long-necked rat (Georychus capensis; "gerechten"; 1.1-1.5 g) was discovered in 1980 in the Kalahari Desert, South Africa. A comparative study of the skull in five specimens from the wild and two specimens from laboratory-raised animals revealed marked sexual dimorphism of the skull and marked ontogenetic dimorphism. The following results were obtained: (1) the skull of the wild-caught specimens was comparatively longer, more rounded, and less robust than the skulls of the laboratory-raised animals. The skulls of the wild-caught specimens were proportionately longer than those of the laboratory-raised animals, and the skulls of the laboratory-raised animals were proportionately shorter than those of the wild-caught specimens. The total length of the skulls of the wild-caught specimens is about 10% shorter than that of the laboratory-raised animals. (2) The length of the right mandibular ramus of the wild-caught specimens is about 5% shorter than that of the laboratory-raised animals, and the left mandibular ramus of the wild-caught specimens is about 5% longer than that of the laboratory-raised animals. The degree of asymmetry of mandibular ramus lengths was the same in both taxa, with the right ramus being longer than the left. (3) All wild-caught specimens exhibited pronounced sexual dimorphism
